Crash Course On A Warrior Society - SPARTA By Edna Marama As an ardent student of history, this concise book on the rise and fall of the Spartan Civilization is quite refreshing to read. The author has succinctly packed into this small book tonnes of scientifically supported historical information about the Spartan society but he cautions the readers where there are controversies on any point amongst the scientific communities. Sparta's strength was actually its greatest weakness. Their focus on producing the finest military war machines in terms of its soldiers who they start training at the age of 7, until they retire at the ripe age of 60 created an economically unbalanced society in that they had to rely on slaves to produce everything else that is required to support their society including their men at war. A diminished military capacity in terms of available fighting men is unable to withstand a rebellious slave population who themselves are descendants of warrior societies. But fair to say, that the Spartans' goal was to produce the best fighting men, and they did achieve that goal. History has immortalised their legacy. Their women, like their men were equally exceptional compared to women from other Greek city states. They trained, lived, loved and fought under the same principles as their men in every aspect following the dictates of their military regimented society and in equal footing with men. This book will give you a crash course in about the Spartan civilization. The Spartan military formation weapons were improved upon by Phillip the Macedonian, and it went on to be a crucial component of the successful military campaigns of Alexander the Great. Great read, Kudos to the author!
